WAR AND OIL

Control over oil is a central motivation for Bush administration's military confrontation with Iraq. The unilateralist nature of the US' new security stance in post-September 11th world has become inexorably linked with the importance of controlling oil.

The dependence of the economy on oil forces US foreign policy to equate control of oil with its "vital interest". Two thirds of the world's oil supplies are in the Persian Gulf, making control and influence in this region crucial.

The fight to control oil has increased global conflict. The production and use of it has destabilized governments and had an anti-democratic influence on oil producing countries. The use of oil is causing climate change, which poses the greatest environmental threat to our planet.

The global economy is underpinned by the use of fossil fuels such as coal, gas and oil. Securing control of these valuable resources has become a major drive for American foreign policy.

Since becoming president George W. Bush has continually stated that the US faces an energy crisis. Although there is little proof, he has based many of his policies on this false understanding. The Bush Administration's response to the "energy crisis" has concentrated on the supply side, with no attempt to reduce an ever-increasing domestic demand for oil.

Oil companies' contributions to the Republican Party in the 2000 election cycle totaled more than US$1 million. Oil runs deep in the Bush administration.

Greenpeace believes that real security will only come about when we stop our global addiction to oil and transfer our resources to produce clean renewable energy.
